Organ Studies at Carson-Newman College

“The organ department at Carson-Newman College has given me the skills that I need to succeed . . . and to make me a qualified church service organist and good performer.”

(Josh Edwards, C-N Class of 2002)

Why Study Organ at Carson-Newman College?

To be a part of a large and dynamic organ studio

Carson-Newman has a large number of organ students, especially for a school of its size. In fact, the music department as a whole provides many opportunities that are not always available in small liberal arts colleges.

To study standard organ literature and gain practical instruction for church organists

At Carson-Newman, organ students learn and perform the standard organ works of Bach, Mendelssohn, Franck, Widor, and other great composers of the past and present. In addition, time is spent on learning “functional” church music, such as hymns.

For numerous and valuable performance opportunities

Organ students at C-N have many opportunities to showcase their talents. In addition to the usual student recitals and studio classes, organ students perform at chapel on the wonderful 44-rank Schantz organ (above), with the various school choirs, and on recitals sponsored by the American Guild of Organists.

Because the four available organs allow for plenty of time to practice

The four organs located in the music building are for use by organ students. The largest organ, a 35-rank Reuter organ (shown on cover, above, and right) is in the Thomas Recital Hall, where organ lessons are typically given. Practice time takes place on this organ as well as three other organs that are only accessible by students taking organ lessons (two of these are shown below).

Because you want a high-quality education in a personal and caring environment

There are many fine music schools, and there are also many wonderful small colleges. But, there are not too many places where you can have the best of both worlds. Carson-Newman may just be the place for you to fulfill your educational goals within the special atmosphere of a small Christian liberal arts college.
